Peer Support Agencies Offer Critical Services During COVID-19

In March, the COVID-19 pandemic changed the way we lived our everyday lives. Peer Support Agencies responded quickly to develop creative ways to continue delivering services to people who need them. Mental health providers continued to provide services during regular business hours by phone and through telehealth, and evening warm lines continued to operate. Technology allowed services to continue with minimal interruption, including check-ins and support groups, which can now take place via Zoom, Facebook Live, and other digital methods.

Leslie Roman, of Hope, Empowerment, Advocacy, Recovery Towards Support (HEARTS), said the COVID-19 emergency has reinforced the importance of peer support as part of recovery. “When the news of COVID-19 hit, my first thought was ‘Well, there goes my job,’ even though in our communities we are seen as valid and worthy. I could hear it now, ‘What’s so essential about support?’ Not only were my assumptions incorrect, but the peer recovery world has shown we are vital. I really want to thank my peers for showing how important connection is, and for the patience we have all shown trying to set up virtual supports so quickly. This morning when I went to a Zoom check-in, I realized the significance of our work and I understood that this really is about social change. This is to show gratitude to my state, my job, the many people who still find peer support significant, and all of us who are virtually showing the world how important peer support is.”

Peer support became even more important as people grew accustomed to working at home, having their children home because of remote learning, not having the same access to work, friends, and family, and everything else that came with new ways of doing things. New Hampshire Community Mental Health Centers (CHMCs) also adapted their services quickly to offer remote and physically distanced visits. The NH chapter of the National Alliance on Mental Illness (NAMI) stood up a central website with resources related to the COVID-19 pandemic, such as where to access services, helpline information, and resources from the NH Department of Health and Human Services (DHHS) and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC.)

NAMI NH continues to offer many support groups and training opportunities virtually. Thank you to the community providers and agencies across New Hampshire for their rapid response and continued support.
Should OCFA Consider a Name Change?

The Office of Consumer and Family Affairs (OCFA) is considering a name change to better reflect what the office does, while using more person-centered language. We want to hear from you!

The OCFA provides information, education and support for children, youth, families, and adults who are affected by mental illness. Our goal is to include input from individuals and families with lived experience into all aspects of the State-funded mental health system and the DHHS Bureau of Mental Health Services’ planning and policy development.

Please submit your suggestions to Thomas.Grinley@dhhs.nh.gov by September 30th.

What’s Happening at the OCFA?

- Exams for Certified Peer Specialists have been scheduled for the remainder of the year. Exams are scheduled for September 14th, and December 7th.

  All exams are 2-4 p.m. in the Fox Chapel of the Main Building at 105 Pleasant Street, Concord.

  For details, or to register, contact Tom Grinley at Thomas.Grinley@dhhs.nh.gov or (603) 271-5045.

- Tom Grinley has continued to do In Our Own Voice presentations for NAMI NH, although the presentations are now offered digitally.

Marty Fuller Receives Advocacy Award

Marty Fuller, former director of the OCFA, recently received the Connections Peer Support Center’s first-ever Peer Support Award, which recognizes an individual who has been a strong advocate for peer support centers, either locally or statewide. The Connections Peer Support Center is a private nonprofit organization managed by individuals who have or are at risk of having mental health challenges.

A longtime Concord resident, Marty has been a passionate mental health advocate for more than 40 years. During her time at DHHS, she re-established the OCFA to bring individual and family voices into all aspects of the state-funded mental health system, as well as planning and policy development.

In addition, Marty developed a statewide self-advocacy empowerment series that she continues to provide as an independent consultant, as well as trainings for the governing boards of nonprofit organizations. She was the co-keynote speaker and a panel member at this year’s Peer Support Conference in Concord, NH, speaking on the importance of advocacy, not only in one’s personal life, but with legislators, policy makers, and others whose decisions affect access to mental health services in New Hampshire.

PSA Satisfaction Survey

The results from the recent satisfaction survey conducted by Peer Support Agencies (PSAs) across the state are in. Three hundred thirty-nine responses were received from all 14 New Hampshire PSAs, showing an overwhelming satisfaction with PSA services:

- 87% said their PSA helped prevent emotional difficulties from turning into psychiatric crises
- 74% said the PSA helped them to stay out of the hospital
- 98% said the PSA helped them understand what recovery means to them
- 86% said the PSA gave them hope they could recover from mental illness
- Of those who have used peer respite, 96% said that respite prevented emotional difficulties from turning into a psychiatric crisis
- 98% said the their PSA improved their quality of life
- 98% expressed overall satisfaction with their PSA. The same percentage would recommend their PSA to others with mental health issues
Did You Know?

- Mad In America (November 17, 2019), announced the launch of the first Hearing Voices Network online support group for family and friends of people who hear voices (https://understandingvoices.com)

- According to The Hill (May 30, 2020), barriers to mental health care existed before the COVID-19 pandemic, but those challenges are exacerbated now as millions report feelings of stress, depression and isolation. The problem is expected to get worse in the coming months as people begin to feel the emotional impacts of the pandemic, and experts say there may not be enough resources to help them.

- According to The National Council for Behavioral Health (December 6, 2019), 66% of New Hampshire voters are more likely to vote for a presidential candidate who promises to do more to address mental health policy issues, according to a new poll by Morning Consult and the National Council. However, only 6% of voters have a detailed knowledge of any candidate’s mental health platform.

- In Frontiers in Psychiatry (December 6, 2019), researchers looking at premature deaths of those with severe mental illness found that cardiovascular disease was a major contributor to this excess mortality. Further analyses showed that premature death was associated with a longer history of tobacco use.

- In Clinical Psychiatry News (May 21, 2020), results from “the first systematic review and meta-analysis of the psychiatric consequences of coronavirus infection” showed that previous coronavirus epidemics were associated with a significant psychiatric burden in both the acute and post-illness stages. “Most people with COVID-19 will not develop any mental health problems, even among those with severe cases requiring hospitalization, but given the huge numbers of people getting sick, the global impact on mental health could be considerable,” co–lead investigator Jonathan Rogers, MRCPsych, Department of Psychiatry, University College London, United Kingdom, said in a news release.

10 Ways to Get Along with Anxiety
Reprinted with permission from Crisis & Trauma Resource Institute

Anxiety is our body’s natural alarm system. It is a normal and useful emotion when we feel under threat. It can save your life when you run to make it across the road because a car is speeding too fast towards you. However, when the threat is in our minds rather than a real physical danger, problems arise.

Most times the stressful situation is not the problem. Rather, the problem is the way we deal or cope with the stress. Our thoughts and behaviors can reinforce our anxiety instead of helping it melt away.

Whether you are worried about work, home or personal issues, anxiety can take a heavy toll on your mental and physical health. It can leave you feeling worn down, irritable and out of control.

The good news? We can learn and practice ways to “be in the same room and get along” with our anxiety. When you are feeling overwhelmed by anything in your life, here are a few things to try that will help you relax and put things in perspective.

1. Breathe deeply.

Anxiety takes our breath away... literally. Practice breathing from your belly, taking air right down into the bottom of your lungs so that your stomach pushes out. Try putting a pillow (or a stuffed animal for a child) on your stomach so you can see it rise and fall with each slow breath. Breathe out for at least as long as you breathe in and try breathing through your nose rather your mouth. Practice this 2-3 times a day. The more you do it, the more likely you will breathe more deeply at other times of the day, keeping your anxiety level down.

2. Focus on something else.

Purposely shift your attention to something unrelated to what you are upset or worried about. Often doing something simple like washing the dishes can distract you enough to feel better about the situation and more relaxed.

3. Slow down.

Give yourself a break and just s-l-o-w down. We can add to our anxiety by rushing around. Notice if you are getting worked up (stomach in a knot, tight chest, mind racing, heart pounding), and consciously take a break to look at things more clearly.

4. Exercise.

Get your body moving! It can create a relaxation response. Build in 20-30 minutes of moderate exercise per day. It could be a simple brisk walk. You probably know this already. Like the Nike slogan says, “Just Do It” – it really does help.

5. Eat healthy foods.

And eat regularly, including breakfast, to keep blood sugar levels steady. This helps to avoid the food-related “anxiety roller coaster ride” that comes with skipping meals or with too much caffeine, alcohol, and sugary or fatty snacks.

6. Face it head-on.

If your anxiety is tied to a particular situation, the only way you can learn to deal with it is to not avoid it. Often, things will be easier, better or simpler than you anticipated, and your worries will have been unfounded. Like many athletes are taught to do, you can build up to the situation by imagining how you will face it. Use positive, confident thoughts such as: “I know I can cope with my fear;” “I can see this as a challenge and do well.”

7. Look at the big picture.

Sometimes we get all worked up about things in the present that really don’t matter in the long...

run. Ask yourself how much this will really matter down the road – it may give you some perspective.

8. Let the past go.
Easier said than done for sure! But if you are feeling bad about things that have already happened, take time to realize that there is nothing you can do to change these things now. You can take steps to begin letting the past go and making positive choices for your future.

Try taking a few minutes out of your day to focus on your breathing or an object like a candle or a pleasant sound. As best as you are able, bring your mind back to the present focus. This can give your mind a little gap or vacation from anxiety and also provide some insight into where your mind takes you. If you have trouble doing this alone, try using a guided meditation, available for free online. Try www.mindful.org.

10. Talk to others.
Connect to a family member or friend and share your anxieties. It can be a great way to gain insight, get advice and alleviate some of your stress by getting support and understanding.

While these tips should help, don’t hesitate to seek professional help if you have lived with anxiety for a long time and are having trouble managing on your own. Call your local Community Mental Health Center to make an appointment with a health care professional.

Alternative Life Center Program Expansion

Kevin A. Rodwell, Assistant Director, Alternate Life Center

The Alternate Life Center (ALC) has created memorandums of understanding (MOUs) with the Lincoln Police Department and Littleton Regional Hospital to increase the availability of on-call peer support services in New Hampshire’s Mental Health Region I.

The pilot, known as the Community Crisis Diversion Program (CCDP), aims to solidify peer support as a viable resource that complements other mental health services in northern New Hampshire.

The ALC is now providing 24/7 on-call peer support services, which allows our organization to work more closely with the communities we serve and to effectively carry out our mission to provide a sanctuary where people learn to create a personal vision leading their own recovery.

The ALC hopes to expand the program to its other locations in Conway, Berlin, and Colebrook.

Laura Mekinova and Kevin Rodwell of the ALC will serve as Peer Community Outreach Specialists during the pilot program. Laura and Kevin are both Intentional Peer Support (IPS) trainers and want to represent our organization in the best way possible while maintaining the integrity of the IPS model and mission statement.

The ALC’s objective, using the IPS model, is to establish critical support services and replicate them statewide. We are recruiting staff and members for training to maintain the long-term viability of these partnerships.
